Q: How to associate a lambda expression with a method, so that the compiler can call it with suitable arguments? I have a user-defined interface which I would like to implement as a List. The interface itself, along with the List method for enumerating it, is provided by a library. The library has a method that returns an Expression>, which it uses to execute queries when it finds an object of the interface T. I'd like the compiler to be able to call this method with T=someEnumerable, for example. The library provides a simple ToList extension method to cast the expression it creates to an Expression>. I would like to add a ToList extension method to the interface so that the only thing I need to add are the generic arguments, but I'm having some difficulty with the syntax. This is the code I've tried: public static class ExpressionHelper { public static Expression> ToEnumerable(this Expression> expression) { return expression; } } It compiles fine, but if I call ToEnumerable on a newly created expression, it can't do anything with it because it's null. Can anyone explain why this doesn't work? And what's the correct syntax? A: It's because, at the time you add the extension method, the expression you created is of the type Expression>, not the type Expression>. There are 2 solutions to your problem: Define your extension method on the expression type it's derived from (namely Expression) Add a cast to Expression to your extension method. For your case, the second one works fine: public static class ExpressionHelper { public static Expression ToEnumerable(this Expression expression) { return (Expression)expression; } } Of
